

"Radiologists in Private Practice"

Richard S. Cooper | Thursday, September 15, 2016

It's an iconic image for a young child who wants to be a doctor someday – that sign on a building that announces he or she is available to see patients. For many, being that solo physician is a dream they chase for years.

After finishing residency, not every new radiologist wants to stay close to academia. Many opt to strike out on their own, either launching a solo practice or joining an existing practice of any size. Instead of devoting time and energy to research and teaching the next radiological generation, you're focused on using your skills to provide the best patient care possible within your community.

Click here to read Rick Cooper's quote in the full article from Diagnostic Imaging.

Richard S. Cooper

Team member bio