Erin Conway is an intellectual property attorney, providing end-to-end legal advice and service to her clients. Erin works closely with her clients to develop comprehensive and business-focused protection, monetization, enforcement, and dispute resolution strategies, taking into account all areas of intellectual property, licensing, and contracts.

In particular, Erin has significant experience representing clients of all sizes in FDA-regulated industries, including food, beverage, nutritional supplement, cosmetic, drug and medical device companies, and understands the effect FDA and FTC compliance issues often has on IP strategy. She has successfully defended clients in these industries against claims for patent infringement, and false advertising and unfair competition under the Lanham Act and state laws in both the federal courts and the ITC.

Erin is a skilled intellectual property and commercial litigator, with particular experience defending generic pharmaceutical companies in Hatch Waxman/Paragraph IV patent infringement actions. Clients trust Erin to efficiently move a case along because of her significant involvement in all phases of litigation (trial and appellate levels) including fact and expert discovery, motion practice, claim construction, summary judgment briefing, trials, and appellate briefing. Erin's litigation experience spans across many technology areas, including pharmaceuticals, computer and software systems, and medical devices.

In addition to her litigation practice, Erin has prepared and prosecuted both U.S. and foreign patents across a wide variety of technical fields, with expertise in the medical device, digital health, and nutritional supplement spaces. Erin also provides valuable patent and regulatory landscape evaluations and freedom to operate opinions to her clients, and regularly drafts and reviews IP licenses and related contracts.

Before joining McDonald Hopkins, Erin prosecuted and litigated patents and other IP for over nine years at highly respected intellectual property boutique firms in both Chicago and Connecticut. While in law school, Erin was a judicial extern to both Magistrate Judge Arlander Keys of the Northern District of Illinois and the
